

Noble Landowners

As nobles, your connection to the king goes back to the feudal system of the Middle Ages. While you may sometimes come into conflict with the king, you would not want to see the monarchy ended. Technically, all nobles are vassals of the king, and any threat to the traditional power structure of the monarchy could also mean a threat to the nobility. Too much change scare you. However, you have no problem with the idea of limiting the Kings power. After all, it was the nobles who made him sign the Magna Carta three centuries ago. Putting restrictions on the king while still keeping the old-fashioned system in place would be your perfect balance.

Common Townspeople

As people of the towns and cities, you are commoners, meaning you are non-nobles. Living in an urban environment makes you more open to change and more desirous of freedom. You do not like being told what to do, and you feel you have certain rights that must be respected. You support whatever option seems to give you the most rights and the most freedom.

Anglicans

As followers of the Church of England, founded by King Henry VIII only a few generations ago, you often find yourself right in the middle. In terms of religion, you definitely do not want to be so traditional as to return to Catholicism, but you also don't feel comfortable with some of the extreme changes and reforms demanded by the ultra-Protestant Puritans. Therefore, you would probably suppose anyone who trying to push you too far in one direction or another. Your political views are similar. You prefer a balance between tradition and reform.

Puritans

As ultra-strict Calvinists, you feel that the Church of England has kept too many of the old Catholic practices and must be purified with heavy Protestant reforms. However, the Stuart King, who is head of the Church, will not support the reforms you demand. What is worse, you fear the Stuarts may secretly be plotting to turn England back to the Catholicism! Luckily, you have plenty of supporters in Parliament.

English Catholics

As a minority religious group in England, you are always fighting to have your voice heard. You want to see him when he returned to the Catholic Church. The more extreme elements among you even attempted a terrorist attack on the King and his government for not supporting your cause. However, you are much more concerned about the Puritans, and their support in Parliament, because they are dedicated to removing every last trace of Catholicism from the country. While the king may be an Anglican, he is not as aggressive against Catholics, so he is the lesser of two evils. Plus, you still have hope that the Stuart Kings may one day be ready to bring England back to the Mother Church.
